In June, 1965, President Johnson ordered a ban on all electronic eavesdropping by Federal agencies, with the exception of national security cases and in those only with the approval of the Attorney General.

The policy of permitting FBI wiretapping in selected national security investigations, with specific authority from the Attorney General, was initiated by President Franklin D. Roosevelt and has been adhered to by all of his successors.

It has been generally assumed that the FBI has at various times tapped foreign embassies and the residences of foreign diplomats, but hard information about this practice has never surfaced.

In recent years, the number of FBI national security wiretaps in effect at any given time has averaged between 35 and 40. FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover told a House committee last Feb. 10 that 32 national security wiretaps were then operational. During World War II the number of FBI wiretap ran as high as 140.

The State Department not only has known about the tapping of the Dominican Embassy, but has been fed whatever Intelligence was gathered in the surveillance.

Some observers believe such information was particularly useful to American policy-makers during the Dominican civil war last year. Bosch, for example, was in frequent touch with rebel leaders in Santo Domingo by telephone from his home in Puerto Rico.
